

The New England Center for Continuing Education

VIDEO IMAGE NATION

This program will center on the need to expand the current use of video within a "future concept" of advances in hardware technology. Portable video equipment is rapidly moving us away from an expensive, one-way communication structure toward an inexpensive, two-way communication system that will demonstrate our needs through a diffused, self-generated communicative network. This begins with a re-education of our thought patterns concerning video usage. Most applications of video (portable or otherwise) is still done for a passive audience. Little of it, including major network documentaries and experiments, ever puts the equipment in the hands of the individuals, allowing them to generate their own ideas and demonstrate his/her needs and discoveries. There is an ever-increasing awareness that this attitude must change if our socio-personal existence is to survive. Our community and personal lives have lost their cohesion and effective flavor due to a national syndication of opinion and attitude.

Educators as well as individuals must increase their expertise of video tools; with porta-paks as well as their community cable stations. We must learn to use the equipment as a means to generate a variety of questions and responses to inputs from our environments. An educator must help a person shape his/her own content whether it be a community shared problem or an artistic, individual response. As a living environment we must be able to reach out and make choices rather than accept a given answer or wait for a change in national attitude.

Programs will demonstrate the present state of video hardware and begin a dialogue on the software of the next decade; how we can best acquaint ourselves with it and where we can go with it.
